Water

The urns in this section biodegrade quickly and naturally once placed in water, some in as little as 4 hours. If multiple family members or loved ones wish to participate in scattering or to create their own small memorials, miniature or keepsake-size urns allow for these options. See page 22 for details. Urns are hand-crafted and may vary slightly in size and appearance.

Water Biodegradable urns are supplied with a biodegradable water-soluble bag into which the cremated remains must be placed. Federal and local regulations must be followed when placing an urn at sea (no closer than 3 nautical miles from shore).

a Greener Funeral.org

Your guide to creating a more unique and meaningful farewell that is gentler on the planet

WHAT IS A GREENER FUNERAL?

Webster's online dictionary defines the word "green" (as it pertains to products and services) as "not harmful to the environment." Generally, a green funeral is any end-of-life ritual that is as harmless as possible to the environment.

At death—the final rite of passage—we use ritual to celebrate, honor and preserve the memory of a life. Many environmentally-conscious families today seek a mix of traditional and green funeral options. "A Greener Funeral" and its companion Web guide, aGreenerFuneral.org, have been created to help you learn more about what is involved in planning a greener funeral for yourself or a loved one.

The modern green funeral, also known as a "natural funeral" or "eco-funeral," is both old and new. End-of-life rituals, including funerals and memorial services, are among the most significant practices of every culture on earth. These rituals have evolved over thousands of years of human history and many of the practices associated with greener funerals, such as shrouds, have long been in use.

Greener funeral practices are often compatible with the traditions of the major religions. Judaism and Islam, for example, have traditionally called for shrouds or simple wooden caskets and no embalming. Hinduism and Buddhism allow cremation, while traditionally, Catholicism, Judaism and Islam have not. Although cremation is now common practice among all religions, consult with your spiritual leader to see which greener funeral rituals honor your religious tradition.

The essence of a greener funeral is a reduction in environmental impact. Many people find that a more natural funeral is also more meaningful for the mourners. Among the options for a greener funeral is the use of biodegradable funeral products (caskets, shrouds and urns) made from sustainable, eco-friendly materials that minimize the impact on the planet.

CREMATION – USING FEWER RESOURCES

For many years, cremation has been the most common alternative to the traditional funeral. In some regions of America, cremation is chosen for nearly 80% of funerals.

Cremation is the reduction of the body to bone fragments through the application of intense heat. The fragments are then finely processed so that they can be placed in an urn for final disposition. Cremation requires no harmful chemicals like those used in the embalming process, and if the remains are scattered, no space in the ground is required.

Cremation uses far fewer resources than conventional burial, but it does have an environmental impact. Cremation requires the burning of fossil fuels, and some older cremation facilities use significantly more energy compared to newer ones. Mercury is also emitted when a person with dental amalgam fillings is cremated, but the development of effective filtration devices and the decline in the use of dental amalgam fillings will mitigate this problem.

“Flameless Cremation” uses less energy and is considered by some to be a gentler, more eco-friendly alternative to traditional flame-based cremation. The process, sometimes called Alkaline Hydrolysis, occurs in a pressurized, stainless steel vessel filled with a heated alkaline solution. The alkalis, found in common household products, act as the catalyst to accelerate the body’s natural decomposition.

Families choosing cremation can take additional steps to make the process more eco-friendly, beginning with the use of shrouds or eco-friendly caskets. Cremation also allows for the recycling of medical implants. Cremated remains may be placed in urns made from materials that break down naturally in the earth, such as bamboo, cornstarch or sustainably-produced handmade paper.

For those selecting water burial there are salt, gelatin and other biodegradable urns designed to float briefly, and then dissolve within hours or days, reducing the impact on aquatic life. Families who prefer to disperse or scatter cremated remains can use specially-designed, recyclable scattering tubes that facilitate clean, easy scattering.

Most cemeteries provide a variety of options for cremated remains, including ground spaces, columbaria (above-ground niches) or special gardens for the scattering of the remains. These are also greener options, because they use less space.

NEW BURIAL OPTIONS - A LIGHTER FOOTPRINT

Greener funerals have inspired a variety of new funeral products that are sustainable and eco-friendly. Whether you want to reduce your carbon footprint or seek a simpler, more natural way to go, there are more options now than ever before.

Green burial is a “new” practice that is really very old, because it is based on methods used by some cultures for thousands of years. Green burial means that the body, which is not embalmed, is buried in an eco-friendly casket or shroud in a manner that allows it to return to the earth as quickly as possible. For this reason, green burial is also called “natural burial” or “eco-burial.”

A green burial may take place in a conventional modern cemetery that uses eco-friendly methods or in a green cemetery. With green burial, graves are typically dug by hand, and concrete vaults or grave liners are not used. Landscaping consists of native plants and trees that help create or preserve habitat for animals. There are no manicured lawns, eliminating the need for chemicals, irrigation and gas-powered mowers. Trees, natural stones and other materials are used in place of elaborate headstones. Some green cemeteries even use GPS coordinates to “mark” graves.

Many conventional cemeteries and memorial parks have designated areas exclusively for green burial, so be sure to ask what options are available to you.

With cremation, there are additional “greener” burial options for cremated remains, such as:

Water burial: Cremated remains are placed in a biodegradable container designed to break down in water within hours or days.

Scattering: Cremated remains are dispersed on land or over a body of water. Many cemeteries have dedicated scattering gardens which provide a convenient place that families return to when they want to remember their departed loved one.
